The Teacher's Potential

The great French Emperor Napoleon attacked Austria during the concluding years of the eighteenth century. The dominance of the French army was such that the Austrian citizens had to flee the villages to save their lives. As per legends, when the victorious army entered the Austrian territory, it was like a ghost town bereft of any citizens. Yet to their surprise, a schoolteacher was sitting in his school waiting for students. Amused generals took him to Napoleon who asked the teacher why he was still waiting for students when all have fled the village. The teacher replied "I have the hope that they will return soon". Napoleon continued "Aren't you afraid to remain here even after your army was defeated". The teacher said "No. Because I have no enemies". "What you intend to do now"? asked Napoleon for which the teacher replied "I am sure, one day my students will return and then I will train them to wage a war against you and win freedom for the country". Napoleon was gracious enough to leave him unharmed.

The above incident, may be a folklore, highlights the enormous potential of a teacher. He is the true architect of nation building. The courage, confidence, and character of a dedicated teacher can work marvels. He can guide and inspire generation of students who one day will make the country proud. As the proverb goes any long journey starts with a single step and we the teachers must realise our true potential and start our journey in that direction.
