Principal's Desk

When Johannes Gutenberg, a German goldsmith, invented a Printing machine in around 1450, no one dreamed that it could bring about a revolution so powerful that it could change the course of human civilisation beyond comprehension. It profoundly influenced Renaissance; transformed common citizens into scholars; brought about revolutions in many countries; advanced science and technology and more importantly powered the entire civilisation to a new high.

Even with such outstanding credentials, the printing press had a humble beginning. The nobles stayed away from it and preferred manual scribes and even thought that the books printed through such machines are befitting only to the lower class. Some medieval scholars even thought that those books will spoil women due to the new found access to knowledge and education! Yet no one could halt the wheels of change and the world could never be the same again.

The temporary hush in academics induced by the spread of the deadly virus has indeed provided us an opportunity to see beyond our existing achievements and abilities and look forward towards new directions and possibilities. It is time to redefine the entire process of teaching and learning and plan new dynamism in academics. Through meticulous planning and relentless execution, we can transform the entire system to an impressive alternate level. Perhaps it should pass through many 'takes' before attaining perfection. It is time we begin the process of new explorations in academics. Who knows, one day we can arrive at a refined model which is capable of bringing about positive changes that can be even more revolutionary than the changes brought about by the Printing machine.
