To bring in the feel factor

When we decide to construct a house, we plan diligently and lay a strong foundation so that the structure lasts for generations. Yet it remains a structure until it is transformed into a "home" through the organic connections established between the members who reside inside and through the relationships between the people around and society as a whole. It is that mutual affinity that does the magic metamorphosis, converting an inanimate structure into a dynamic and lively domain.

So are academic institutions which stand tall in the community due to their association and contribution to the welfare and dynamism of the society. The delicate bondages built between the teacher and the taught during classroom interactions transforms the classroom ambience into a sunshine Shangri-La. It is for this reason the classroom sessions have thrived for ages and perhaps will continue to be the harbingers of change and development in future as well. The human feel factor of course is a dominant factor in all such endeavours.

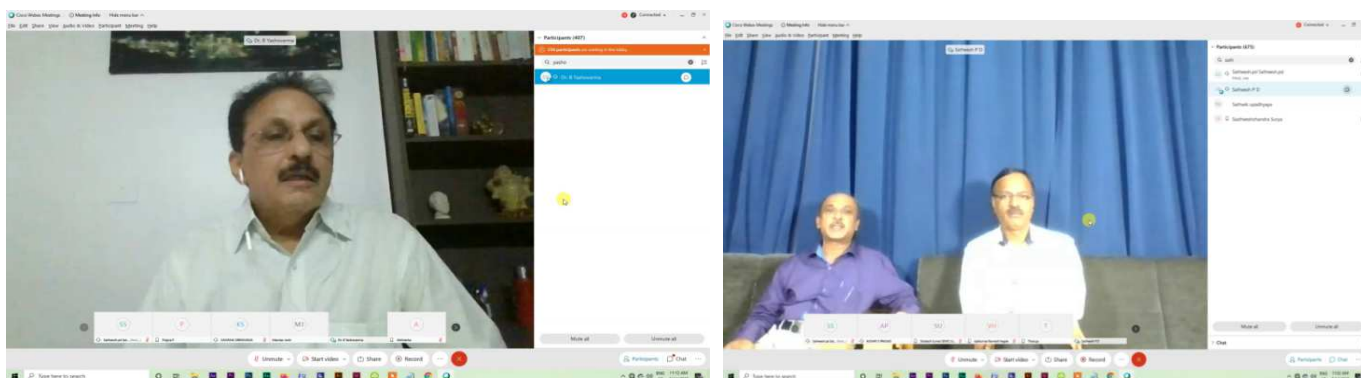

But times have changed, inevitably forcing us to look for alternative possibilities, particularly when the dangers of the pandemic are looming large. Fortunately technology has provided radically different alternatives, perhaps more effective than the classroom knowledge communion, as far as contents and features are concerned. Yet additional flavours need to be added to this process, particularly the feel factor. Hopefully our teachers will soon master this process, to make the academic journey a blissful experience.
