Today's Socrates

Philosophies have always been the backbone of almost all successful social systems. They remain obscure and yet provide the continuous stimuli for progress and development of the system. Great minds of humanity have contributed to the pool of philosophies from which we can choose the best for our purpose and circumstances. Envisaging some, for our purpose demands a cognizance of few such tenets.

If anyone is asked to prepare a list of all time great philosophers, a name which is certain to appear in it is that of Socrates, the great Greek Philosopher. Interestingly, he lived almost 2500 years ago (470 – 399 BC) and has influenced scores of generations of thinkers. It is through his students Plato and Xenophon who themselves are outstanding thinkers on their own right, the contributions of Socrates could see the light of the day. In spite of being an ancient Philosopher, what is extremely surprising is his relevance even in these modern times. He posed series of questions to the seekers without answering any. The seekers themselves obtained the answers as his questions drove them towards the required solution. The questions were so gripping that the seeker could not but go for answers himself. This method today is rightly called Socratic Method. It is a form of cooperative argumentative dialogue between individuals, based on asking and answering questions to stimulate critical thinking.

Socratic Method continues to be a brilliant tool to draw out the best from a student. It has all the essential ingredients to drag a student into an academic exercise without the limitations of boredom. We the teachers may take a leaf or two from the annals of Socrates to brighten the teaching learning process and to make it a collectively joyful experience.
