What Makes Research an Ivory Tower?

If academic growth is considered a structure, it must look like a pyramid with the highest admissions to the primary level and the least admissions to the research qualifications considering research as the highest academic activity. It is a degree earned after the post-graduation, like MPhil or PhD at a tertiary level. Therefore, only a few students remain successful in climbing up the ladder and reaching the top position of academic excellence. What is the big deal?

Of course, research is not kid's play. There is a need to understand its importance. Even among the staff members, only a few become eligible to guide their students for research qualification. Hence there's no doubt regarding the prime position of research programmes in higher education institutions.

If this is the story of research as an academic qualification, the need for research as a part of life is another. The line of distinction between study and research fades quickly in real-life situations. One must develop research as a bent of mind and study several socio-economic aspects while making decisions. It may be from buying groceries from a shop or investing in financial markets, from deciding on a medical facility to making a foreign trip for exploration. In all cases, we need to study and research. Then it is possible to have the best from the least. In this context, a child not only learns from the schools but also learns equally from society: family, public, friends, relatives, and peer groups. Hence, as an aptitude, research needs to be developed by the learners at every stage.

This bent of mind must also become a part of the curriculum at every stage of education. The learners must develop an attitude toward research, and that must begin at an early stage. There must be ample scope for research while transacting academic content in every subject at every level. They must realise the value of research and its utility in real-life situations. Only by then will the learners inculcate research as a way of life and not just a qualification at the end of the academic pyramid.
